

artist_nn

November 14, 2025

The general workflow of this is: - get artists song data (and subsequently their cowrite data).
- generate “basic” features on that data that are not very network oriented - run a model with the basic features predict artist success - generate features that capture nepotistic behavior in the network - run a model with the basic features and the new network-based features - compare models

This performs very poorly (negative R^2 suggests that the model explains literally none of the variance in the data) for a variety of reasons. 1 is that the basic features aren't descriptive enough. Its possible that more features would help (potentially more granular ones such as average general lyric semantics), but it seems like network features are necessary.

Note that this model was a really basic attempt at predicting the data, there are many things that could be done to improve it, including just better configuration.

this loads in the node features, which we extracted with a separate r script

Even a very simplistic attempt at adding network features for just the top five songs of an artist, improves the model immensely. A few things to note here: - both the models could be improved significantly by better selection of features - the base model need more features that are descriptive of the data - the network model may need less features, potentially removing noise - the models would both benefit from running a series of hyperparameter tests and other configuration changes. - We also think there are other models that could provide insight into why it predicts what it does (random forest) - Finally, these models do their best at explaining early artist success, but are likely skewed by the fact that we only train on the top 1k artists. As we're able to train on more diverse artists with varying degrees of success, we'll be able to get a better idea of how accurate this type of model is.
